ABQ: The First Fifty Years
By Margaret Shakespeare

The mid-twentieth century was a fertile time for music in America. Home-grown talent blossomed. Orchestras expanded. Presenters welcomed diverse programming. Players and composers found new opportunities. Just the sowing field where a fresh idea could take root, grow into a whole new tradition and redefine a genre. In 1960 five brass players got together with a mission—to perform serious chamber music and encourage development of a brass quintet repertory. They called themselves the American Brass Quintet. And for fifty years the ABQ has been breaking new ground and indeed has changed the landscape of brass playing and, particularly, chamber music.

The late Arnold Fromme, an ABQ co-founder and tenor trombonist until 1970, had started collecting editions for brass ensembles during his Juilliard School student days. In an interview several years ago he said, "We had a workshop, always with a conductor—not quite chamber music. In the 1950s a few groups emerged and found work, mostly demonstrating instruments and playing pop tunes, through Young Audiences." Fromme and co-founder, the late Gilbert Cohen, a bass trombonist, along with trumpetists Robert Heinrich and the late Theodore Weis, and the late hornist Arthur Goldstein, focused elsewhere. And on a

"It is with great enthusiasm that all the members of the Juilliard community celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the American Brass Quintet. This great ensemble and its individual members have had a transformative impact on brass chamber music at Juilliard since their historic residency began in 1967. With intelligence, artistry, and imagination, the ABQ has exemplified the highest standards of chamber music for brass instruments during its remarkable existence." Joseph W. Polisi, President, The Juilliard School

ABQ's 50th Anniversary Concert is Friday, October 15, 2010 at Alice Tully Hall, Lincoln Center, New York City. Information on tickets: 212-769-7406.

The program will feature Joan Tower's popular Copperwave, the New York premiere of Trevor Gureckis' Fixated Nights, Venetian music from the ABQ recording In Gabrieli's Day, fantasies by Thomas Stolzer, the New York premiere of David Sampson's Chants and Flourishes, and Gabrieli's Sonata XX for twenty-two brass players in five choirs.

snowy December 11, 1960 an audience at New York’s 92nd Street Y heard the Quintet’s debut, works of Byrd, Gabrieli and Holborne. Real chamber music for brass.

While players whirled in and out a revolving door, that original ABQ mission took hold. They started compiling a repertory from the Renaissance, the Golden Age of Brass. Fromme among others had experience in the New York Pro Musica and other period-instrument groups, which informed their performance practice on modern instruments. Since transcriptions were never part of the ABQ mix, the group struck out to commission works for a second Golden Age of Brass. Charles Whittenberg produced Triptych in 1962, the first of nearly 200 such works. Some composers, notably Eric Ewazen, have an ongoing ABQ relationship, writing multiple pieces. “I love that they are chamber musicians, and they want that kind of music—with solos and contrapuntal writing,” he says. David Sampson, who first wrote for the ABQ in 1986, says, “I liked that they were the bass trombone quintet...because the timbre is a continuous line from the trumpets all the way down.” That was exactly the idea—bass trombone, not tuba, suited the idiom.

With a well-laid foundation, the building started. By 1965 personnel stabilized with trumpeters John Eckert and eighteen-year-old Gerard Schwarz and hornist Edward Birdwell joining Fromme and bass trombonist Robert Biddlecome. The earliest reviews glowed: “…gifted performers, expert ensemble...[they] do everything but blow the walls out...” (The New York Times). “But we felt that we had to have a recording,” says Biddlecome, a member from 1963 until his retirement in 1991. And two Folkways releases did raise their profile, as did an eight-week European tour in 1967. “That’s when we really got our motors going,” says Birdwell, remembering reactions. “They’d never seen five guys come out and play a two-hour concert ranging from the fourteenth century to the latest hot thing. It blew their minds that anybody could sustain such a concert.”

Did a musical style or ABQ sound develop? Yes and no. Gerry Schwarz, who went on to have a fine conducting career, says, “We had perfection as a goal.” And he contributed mightily, along with a lot of midnight rehearsals, to reach it. Composer Ingolf Dahl, hearing a live broadcast of his own Music for Brass Instruments (1944), fired off a fan letter: “...I would never have thought such breath-taking virtuosity and refinement of brass playing possible. It was music making of the highest order.” Virgil Thomson once said, “...these boys are a lot of fun to write for because they can do things other people can’t... I love the sound they make, and I would say they are the best in the business.” The “boys” never tried to match sounds when auditioning new members. “It’s always been part of our philosophy that the best person is a combination of an excellent player and someone who identifies with who we are and what we do,” says Raymond Mase, trumpeter since 1973. That worked. John Rojak, Biddlecome’s successor, says, “Bob has such a legacy, establishing bass trombone as a crucial quintet eleagain a decade later, after three personal changes, and said, "...the ensemble's performance [has become] even more lyrical, confident and nuanced."

Two residencies reinforce music-making—at the Aspen Music Festival and School (since 1970) and at The Juilliard School (since 1987). "Aspen keeps us together year-round," says David Wakefield, hornist since 1976. "We touch a wide range of students there, and a fair number who go on to university teaching remember their excellent training and will book us for a mini-residency to give that experience to their students. Also we have had opportunities to work more intensively with composers." David Sampson, whose Strata, commissioned with a National Endowment for the Arts grant, they premiered at Aspen in 1999, says, "We have an exhilarating give and take. They can play the most difficult brass music, and they make an extraordinary commitment to living with a piece."

"And Juilliard, just the prestige of the name associated with the ABQ, is an extraordinary endorsement of our role in the chamber music field," says Mase. The School's president Joseph Polisi, says, "With the ABQ appointment there was an immediate growth of student ensembles. Chamber music is an essential part of any musician's training. The ABQ introduced Baroque brass playing to Juilliard. And now brass players will be meshing with our new historical performance program." For its 2006 centennial, Juilliard commissioned Copperwave from Joan Tower, which has become the most requested work in the ABQ touring repertoire.

The ABQ has toured all fifty states and five continents (twenty-nine weeks in 1968 set the record). The US State Department sent them to Asia and to South America. They were the first American brass ensemble to perform in China. But touring has taken a few new turns with the guidance of Todd Stanton, manager since 1991. "Todd is not just our manager, he's our best friend," says Michael Powell, tenor trombonist since 1983. Stanton says, "The mini-residencies have really taken off—over a hundred venues in seven countries." Stanton also linked them with composer/jazz pianist Billy Childs who wrote Two Elements, a work which he and the Quartet toured. And for their commissioning of emerging composers, he found grant support from the Jerome Foundation.

Ray Mase says, "In fifty years we've never been awarded big prizes or had our picture on the cover of fancy music magazines. We have quietly stuck to our guns and brought forth many important pieces—and done so with integrity and commitment." "Since joining [in 1998] I have been struck by the consistency of purpose, no matter the membership," says trumpeter Kevin Cobb. "Our mission is bigger than any individual, so it's easy to imagine that on the hundredth anniversary the group will be continuing to celebrate its dedication to serious brass chamber music. Let's hope someone reading this will be attending that concert."

FIFTIETH SEASON
ABQ Memories

Edited by Kevin Cobb

On the occasion of the 50th anniversary, we thought it might be interesting for our readers to hear what we, the members of the ABQ, feel are some of our favorite memories as we look back. Obviously, none of us was around at the very beginning, but we’ve compiled a short little segment to make note of a few special moments from each member. As hard as it was to select only a few memories, we think what follows will provide a nice picture of what stands out over the years.

Michael Powell

I have been in the American Brass Quintet for 27 years. I consider myself an extraordinarily lucky trombonist. Even after so many years in the same seat, it is still a great thrill for me to perform in this wonderful ensemble. I auditioned on December 30, 1982. My first performance with the American Brass Quintet was January 29, 1983 at the Arts Club of Chicago. We played works of Bertali, Holborne, the Americana Suite, two fugues by J.S. Bach, and the Suite of William Lovelock. Musically and personally, I felt very much at home in the ABQ from the beginning. There have been many memorable and rewarding experiences with the ABQ. Being a participant in the premieres of so many great works written for the ABQ by composers of our time is something in which I take much pride. Working directly with and befriending these composers makes it all the better. One of the greatest rewards was the beginning of the Juilliard residency in 1987, which did as much as anything to validate our raison d’etre.

Actually, I will never forget a very special summer ABQ performance (c. 1985) of Jacob Druckman’s Dark Upon the Harp (for mezzo-soprano, brass quintet and percussion) in which he conducted and the soloist was Jan DeGaetani. That performance fortunately is preserved on a compact disc of Jan’s work from Bridge Records. Both artists were among the greatest, mezzo-soprano and composer, and they are missed. Another performance I will not forget is when we played the Elliott Carter Brass Quintet at Avery Fisher Hall in the middle ‘80s, as part of the New Horizons Festival. Interestingly, Jake Druckman was running that show as well.

Raymond Mase

One of the most fascinating and rewarding times in my ABQ memory was the summer of 1974, my second year in the group, when we worked with Elliott Carter as he composed his Brass Quintet for us. Here we were “stuck” in the mountains of Aspen, Colorado for our summer residency with Elliott Carter as Aspen’s composer in residence writing for us. It was amazing. Elliott would compose a short fragment of music and bring it in to the group. We’d spend a few days working it and play it for him. He’d listen, make adjustments and before the end of that session, give us more music to prepare for the next time. I still remember the excitement each and every time we met with him and got new music. Eventually Elliott provided a “key” so that the 19 sections of the piece could be woven together into the one continuous work just before the end of summer. With some careful cutting and pasting, we all had our parts put together in time for the September premiere for the BBC in London. It was a summer to remember.

My favorite ABQ travel episode seems particularly relevant today with the ongoing problems musicians have with carrying instruments on board flights. We were headed out of Kennedy Airport for San Francisco on a Pan American 747. The plane was late arriving from London and ultimately bound for Asia. We’ve always carried our instruments on board with us, but this time there was a snag. Not only were they telling us at the gate that they wouldn’t let us bring the instruments on board, but all the checked baggage was containerized—if we didn’t check the instruments immediately, they would not be able to be checked later on. We decided we’d take our chances—if we couldn’t find a way to stow them in the cabin, we’d simply get off the plane and probably have to cancel our concert. I remember the group’s anxiety as we hurried down the ramp to get on board. But then just as we entered the plane came a voice—"Hello Mr. Biddlecome—how are you?" It was Evelyn David—a piano student for two years at Aspen and PanAm flight attendant. Bob said, "I’m glad to see you. We have a problem." Bob quickly explained our problem and Evelyn said calmly "Come with me, I’ll take care of it." When the gate attendants arrived a few minutes later (and after finding a cabin closet to take care of the instruments) we were sipping champagne and having a friendly chat with Evelyn about our wonderful Aspen summers. Not sure the gate attendants ever really found out where the instruments disappeared to, but for once we

A Special Year

By Raymond Mase

It was wishful thinking on my part to expect that with our 50th anniversary would become a period of rest, relaxation and reflection for the ABQ. Yes, I have noticed us exchanging a smile or pat on the back here or there in acknowledgment that we have actually made this milestone anniversary, but I have to say that it has only been in the midst of an incredible surge of energy from everyone. For a few years we have been looking ahead to this anniversary hoping that it could live up to expectations, and based on the work we've been doing, I am quite optimistic. Here are three major highlights—

The centerpiece of the ABQ's 50th anniversary celebration will undoubtedly be our performance at Alice Tully Hall on October 15. The program will include first New York performances of works written for us by Trevor Gureckis and David Sampson alongside two of our all-time favorite collections of early music—a compilation of my editions of Venetian music from our recording In Gabrieli's Day, and a suite of fantasias of Thomas Stolzer that were performed on some of the very first ABQ concerts. Opening the program will be Joan Tower's Copperwave—the 2006 commission that has become our most frequently performed work of the last four years—and to top it all off, the concert will conclude with Gabrieli's Sonata XX—a magnificent work for twenty-two players in five choirs where we'll be joined by our Juilliard brass students. Along with these musical offerings will be a video presentation that Kevin Cobb has prepared with interviews of ABQ players, composers and loyal supporters. Heartfelt thanks to everyone who is contributing to the program, and particularly to The Juilliard School for presenting us.

Another equally important part of the 50th anniversary celebration is the release of our new recording—a two-cd set for recent activities in the field, and plans for the future.

As one might imagine, these three anniversary projects—the concert, the new recording, and our seminar—have taken all kinds of planning and organizing over the past several years. Of course all of this work for the anniversary is in addition to our regular ABQ concert seasons, and Juilliard and Aspen residency responsibilities. But even with all the added energy and commitment that the anniversary has required, we have managed some time along the way to reflect with friends and colleagues on the ABQ's rich history and contributions. I am not sure whether the ABQ founders imagined the group reaching this 50th anniversary when they first took the stage five decades ago, but the ABQ legacy is alive and well and will hopefully continue well beyond this special year.

ABQ's 50th Anniversary Double CD now available.

State of the Art: The ABQ at 50 (Summit DCD 553). While it might have been quite a bit easier to have compiled an "ABQ Greatest Hits" anthology for this anniversary, we decided instead on something quite different—a collection of eleven new pieces written for the ABQ since the year 2000. It took lots of time and hard work over a nearly three year period to get all of the music prepared, performed, and recorded, but there could be no better representation of the ABQ's mission in promoting new brass music than this recording.

As with past anniversaries, the ABQ will host a special State of the Art seminar at Juilliard on Monday October 11 to take an in depth look at the brass chamber music field by the people most closely involved with it. We will invite colleagues from other ensembles, students, composers, and brass quintet enthusiasts to talk about the health of brass chamber music, managed to get the best of the airlines.

David Wakefield

In 1970, having just graduated from high school, I was a student in the Aspen Music School. I was living in a condo next door to American Brass Quintet members Lou Ranger and Bob Biddlecome, so I got to meet the members of the ABQ through them. The group would often rehearse in a common room at the condo complex and I on several occasions would sit in and observe their rehearsals. I remember watching the rehearsal (Gerard Schwarz, Lou Ranger, Ed Birdwell, Arnie Fromme, and Bob Biddlecome) and being impressed at their virtuosity, but especially their stylistic approach to early music with a strong emphasis on blend and balance. That summer among the works they tackled, were Henry Brandt's Fourth Millennium, a quirky piece with theatrical elements. It was fascinating to see the ABQ approach modern music with the same diligence as with their entire repertoire. This all had a big impact on my approach toward chamber music.

Now fast forward to the spring of 1976. I had completed one year of my DMA at Juilliard, having done my undergraduate work and a master's there as well. I had been freelancing for about a year and had seen members of the ABQ in the freelance scene. About mid May, I got on the M104 bus going down Broadway and saw Ed Birdwell on the bus. We sat together and chatted perhaps only 10 minutes before he got off for his stop. I got a call a few days later asking me to audition for the ABQ. It turns out that on that bus, Ed having already made the decision to leave the group, was pondering who might replace him.

John D. Rojak

Some favorite moments for me have come at my own expense: 1992 concert at Santa Cecilia in Rome when my heart stopped as I searched for the 3rd page of the second movement of Colchester Fantasy. The guys waited for a few minutes as I tore through all my parts in vain, until I finally realized that movement has only 2 pages and the concert could continue. 1994 in Hawaii, seeing the beaches with the pipeline waves, the lava-spewing volcano, and amazing diversity of those islands before heading to the wonderful chaos of Hong Kong and Taiwan; then in Taiwan, our announcements to the audience of our pieces when the programs had not shown up. Especially my closing remarks in slow motion Chinese, which proved how polite audiences can really be. 1998 in Tortola—snorkeling, coaching the school band on 70’s Superhits Medley and enjoying the waitress’ note asking if our new member Kevin was married. 2001, a week after 9/11 driving across North Carolina, stopping at a real locals’ barbecue joint and how concerned everyone in the restaurant was about our New York homes. Coffeyville, Kansas provided some great moments, too, where I helped critique twig sculptures in an art class I was invited into as I wandered the campus, then after the concert the motel desk clerk told us, after I asked where we could go for a beer that, “I’d go right back to my room.”

Kevin Cobb

Even in my comparatively short tenure, there have been a lot of concerts and memorable moments. But I do have a couple of my own memories that I feel stand out: The first was in 2001 when the ABQ went to Prague. It was a very special time to be playing in Europe as it’s not a regular touring area for the group, and the audiences are so supportive of classical music. We had many wonderful concerts at several special venues on that tour and almost all of them ended with some “rhythmic clapping” applause that prompted us to play many encores. But in one venue, a church in the middle of town, we played the Monteverdi madrigal, Ah, Dolente Partita for one encore. Playing this music, for a supremely captivated audience, in a space that loved Monteverdi as much as anyone listening, it can only be described as truly magical. It was something that renewed my belief in the powerful, transportive quality of music.

The other episode I’ll never forget happened in the very first week I joined the group. After struggling for a few years after school to find where I might belong, hoping that I could make a difference somewhere, I became increasingly frustrated as so many of the very elite ensembles I played with seemed wrought with bitterness and cynicism. Being fresh out of school, I felt intimidated and depressed by the prospect of this. But on an ABQ concert in Florida, at a church with terrible acoustics, with a small, Sunday afternoon audience, the concert seemed rather low profile at best. I was shocked when we came off stage and Ray exclaimed, “That was great! I wish I could do this all the time.” It certainly wasn’t lost on me that someone who had spent his whole life with this group still loved to play chamber music and I knew I had landed in the right place.

ABQ Emerging Composer Commissioning Program

The next round of ABQ’s emerging composer commissioning program has a deadline of October 1, 2010. Please visit www.AmericanBrassQuartet.org and click on Commission for details of the program. The Emerging Composer Commissioning Program received its initial funding from The Jerome Foundation of St. Paul, MN and has so far awarded commissions to Gordon Beeferman, Shafer Mahoney and Trevor Gureckis.

Trevor Gureckis is the most recent composer commissioned thru the emerging composer commission program. His “T commemorate dicated Nights” premiered at the Aspen Music Festival in 2010.
